When the Democratic members of the Legislature were refusing to allow the Constitution to be obeyed, they did it with a profusion of pledges. They wanted it understood that they were honest men, who would go to the trial of the Gubernatorial contest not as partisans but as judges. They could not regard themselves in any other or less serious light; and they resented the Republican suggestion that they would be partisan to the end.

All through the proceedings of last winter the Democratic members of the Legislature were led by the party managers. The bosses did the thinking and the planning. The members did the ratifying. So it was in the committee.

Several veteran railroad men were seated in the smoking compartment of a Pullman car the other day. The train was due in Detroit about two hours later. A discussion arose as to the rate of speed that they were traveling at. One of the party guessed that the train was going over forty miles an hour. Another estimated the speed at forty-five miles, another at fifty, and so on. Finally one of the men took out his watch, held it in his hand less than half a minute looking at it steadily all the minute, looking at it steadily all the
